Learn spanish language online free

If you want to know why you should learn Spanish, first look at who it is already. For starters, the people of the United States, a bunch not known for conquering monolingualism, are studying Spanish in record numbers. Spanish, too, is becoming of greater importance in Europe, where it is often the foreign language of choice after English. And no wonder Spanish is a popular second or third language: with about 400 million speakers, it is the fourth most commonly spoken language in the world (after English, Chinese and Hindustan), and geographically the most talked about after English. According to some figures there are more native speakers than English. It is an official language on four continents and is of historical importance elsewhere. Only figures make Spanish a good choice for those who want to learn another language. But there are many other reasons to learn Spanish. Here are a few: Much of the vocabulary of the English language has Latin origins, much of which came in English via French. Since Spanish is also Latin, you will discover while studying Spanish that you better understand your original vocabulary. Similarly, Spanish and English share Indo-European roots, so their grammars are similar. There may be no more effective way to learn English grammar than studying the grammar of another language, as the study forces you to think about how your language is structured. Not so many years ago, the Spanish-speaking population of the United States was limited to mexican border states, Florida and New York. But not anymore. Even states along the Canadian border, such as Washington and Montana, have their share of native Spanish speakers. Yes, it is perfectly possible to visit Mexico, Spain and even Equatorial Guinea without a word of Spanish. But it's not nearly half as fun. Among the real experiences people have had just because they speak Spanish are invited to people's homes for meals, receive lyrics so they can sing along with mariachis, are asked to translate for monolingual travelers, take dance lessons without participating in a group of travelers and are asked to join a pick-up game of football (football), among many others. Time and again while traveling in Latin America and Spain, the door will be open to you if you speak Spanish that is not open to most travelers if you can learn Spanish, you will have a prime opportunity to learn other Latin languages such as French and Italian. And this will even help you learn Russian and German, since they too have Indo-European roots and have some characteristics (such as gender and extensive conjugation) that are present in Spanish, but not English. And it wouldn't be surprising if learning Spanish can even help you learn Japanese or any other non-Indo-European language, since intensive language structure learning can give you a reference point for learning others. Spanish is one of the foreign learning languages for English speakers. Much of his vocabulary is similar to English, and written Spanish is almost entirely jockey: Look at almost every Spanish word and you can tell how it is pronounced. If you are in the United States and work in one of the professions that help, including medicine and education, you will see that your opportunities are expanded by knowing Spanish. And wherever you live, if you are in any occupation involving international trade, communications or tourism, you will similarly find opportunities to use new language skills. If you are in international news, you will see that it is much easier to stay informed about developments in Spain and much of the Western Hemisphere if you know Spanish. There is plenty of interesting news - recent examples include anti-Uber taxi strikes in Bogotí and the impacts of migration from Venezuela - that are little covered in the English media or not covered at all. Whether you enjoy talking, reading or overcoming challenges, you'll find them all learning Spanish. For many people, there is something inherently enjoyable about successful speech in another language. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why children sometimes speak in pig Latin or come up with their own secret codes. While language learning can be a job, efforts quickly pay off when you finally make the most of your skills. For many people, Spanish offers the most rewards with the least effort of any foreign language. It's never too late to start studying. Learning a new language can enrich your life in ways you wouldn't expect, but it still sounds scary, doesn't it? It seems like kids pick up new languages so easily, but when you get a little dry... Terry Vine / Getty Images Would you like to know more about Language? Here are 10 facts to start with: With 329 million native speakers, Spanish is Spanish as world language no. 2 in terms of how many people speak it as their first language, according to Ethnologue. It's slightly ahead of English (328 million), but far behind the Chinese (1.2 billion). Spanish has at least 3 million native speakers in each of the 44 countries, making it the fourth most spoken language behind English (112 countries), French (60) and Arabic (57). Antarctica and Australia are the only continents without a large Spanish-speaking population. Spanish is part of the Indo-European language family, spoken by more than a third of the world's population. Other Indo-European languages include English, French, German, Scandinavian, Slavic and many languages of India. Spanish can be further classified as a romantic language, a group that includes French, Portuguese, Italian, Catalan and Romanian. Speakers of some of them, such as Portuguese and Italian, can often communicate with Spanish speakers to a limited extent. While there is no clear boundary that defines when Latin from what is now the north-central region of Spain became Spanish, it is safe to say that castile language has become a special language partly because of King Alfonso's efforts in the 13th century to standardize language for official use. By the time Columbus reached the Western Hemisphere in 1492, Spanish had reached the point where the language spoken and written would be easy to understand today. To people who speak it, Spanish is sometimes called español and sometimes castellano (the Spanish equivalent of Castile). The labels used differ regionally and sometimes by political stance. Although English speakers sometimes use Castily to refer to Spanish as opposed to Spanish, unlike Latin America, this is not the distinction used among Spanish speakers. Spanish is one of the most loyal languages in the world. If you know how to spell a word, you can almost always know how to pronounce it (although the reverse is not true). The main exception is recent words of foreign origin, which usually retain their original spelling. The Royal Spanish Academy (Real Academia Española), created in the 18th century, it produces authoritative dictionaries and grammar guides. Although his decisions do not have the force of law, they are widely followed in both Spain and Latin America. Among the language reforms promoted by the Academy was the use of a reverse questionnaire and exclamation marks (!). Although they were used by people who speak some of the non-Spanish languages of Spain, they are otherwise unique to the Spanish language. A similarly unique Spanish and several local languages that copied it was ñ, which became standardized around the 14th century. Although Spanish originated on the Iberian Peninsula as a descendant of Latin, today there are far more speakers in Latin America, was brought to the New World by Spanish colonialization. There are minor differences in vocabulary, grammar and pronunciation between Spain Spain and Spain Latin America, not so large as to prevent simple communication. Differences in regional variations in Spanish are roughly comparable to differences between American and British English. After Latin, the language that had the greatest impact on Spanish was Arabic. Today, the foreign language that has the greatest influence is English, and Spanish has adopted hundreds of English words related to technology and culture. Spanish and English share much of their vocabulary through cognates, as both languages originate many of their words from Latin and Arabic. The biggest differences in grammar of the two languages include Spanish use of gender, more extensive conjugation of verbs and widespread use of conjunctival mood. Mood.
